“Stuart Hall, Where’d You Go? Identity Politics and Antiracism’s Debasements”

This discussion presents Stuart Hall’s classic formulation “race is the modality in which class is lived” as a missed opportunity in critical theory, showing how antiracism failed to take seriously the inflection point Hall highlighted. Instead, anti-racism folded under the very racial capitalism Hall challenged. We will discuss how Asian Americans are similarly positioned as miner’s canaries within America’s conversations about race and racism, and how that position can yield critical insights and promulgate progressive politics.
